In November 2016, the government had introduced the Social Security Scheme for Migrant Workers, as part of the Social Security Act for 2073 BS. However, several years later, research specializing in this domain has cast doubts on whether the scheme is truly a safety net or a potential trap.

Migrant workers and self-employed individuals abroad must contribute a minimum of NRs 2,002 monthly, equivalent to 21.33% of the minimum basic monthly salary set by the Nepalese government for domestic industrial workers. Accessing the Social Security Fund is facilitated by an online portal with a user-friendly interface, allowing stakeholders and the mandatory investment of their hard-earned money. They can contribute a minimum of NRs 2,002 monthly, equivalent to 21.33% of the minimum basic monthly salary set by the Nepalese government for domestic industrial workers.

Although the initial launch of the scheme was praised, researchers specializing in this domain have raised concerns about the inaccessibility of the social security fund's websites in many countries. Their reluctance to enroll stems from doubts about the accountability of the institutions managing the scheme. Nepali migrant workers have also expressed concerns about the inaccessibility of the social security fund's websites in many countries. The mandatory investment of their hard-earned money is facilitated by an online portal with a user-friendly interface.

According to the Social Security Fund spokesperson, approximately 58,986 migrant workers have already enrolled in the scheme. The Social Security Scheme distributes funds to cover accidents, disability cases, and dependent family members. While 13.25% of the contribution will be allocated to cover accidents, disability cases, and dependent family support, while 13.25% will go towards the old-age security plan.
